The Western Ridge Project

Current Colorado College students know all too well the truth of construction.

The early morning noise, as well as the lack of parking spaces, has caused many a student to grumble. The Western Ridge Project has invoked fear into many freshmen; will they ever be allowed to live off campus?

The answer is likely yes. In viewing the construction and changes, one must keep a positive outlook. When all is said and done, the improvements will probably outweigh the negative aspects.

The Buddhists believe that before they begin their life-changing work of their Zen practice, the world is exactly how it appears. Mountains are mountains, they are famous for saying, and rivers are rivers.

Once they start to meditate, though, to lose themselves in the change that must occur, mountains cease to be mountains, and rivers cease to be rivers. The Zen student loses the points of reference he has always relied upon: mountains overlap and dissolve into rivers, rivers break their barriers and rise up like mountains, and the student becomes less and less sure about who and what he is, dissolving his sense of self within a dissolving world.

With enough understanding and practice, things begin to click back into place: mountains go back to being mountains and rivers go back to being rivers. But meditation has moved the student to a place where he can see that the mountains exist in relationship to the rivers and that they make each other possible. He has opened his eyes to the interrelatedness of everything, including the world and himself.

This life, I do not know how to live it. No one taught me. No one told me about its turbulence. I think I thought "loving" was the sweetest, easiest thing in the world. Which is not at all what it is. No one told me about storms, squally winds on the edge of the abyss, eclipses of the sun, thirst that kills within inches of a spring. Never could I have imagined the terrors there are in joys. Wanting to scream for mercy. Joy is unbearable. And I never suspected it. I am exhausted. What happiness!
